Wildfire & Asbestos Exposure

Asbestos is one of the most heat-resistant substances known to man, yet it can be highly toxic when it is damaged by fire. When homes or structures catch fire, asbestos products become damaged and release carcinogenic fibers that become airborne and transportable by smoke. The potential of exposure is even higher once clean up begins after the firers, as the fibers are open and easily disturbed. Learn more with this guide:

BLM Taking Comments on Proposed Public Lands Rule Through June 20, 2023

The proposed rule directly responds to the growing need to better manage public lands, waters, and wildlife in the face of devastating wildfires, historic droughts, and severe storms that communities are experiencing across the west, as well as to deepen BLM's collaborative work with communities, states, and Tribes to support responsible development of critical minerals, energy, and other resources.
